I've been talking to several lawyers and get the feeling in the end that they're all going to want clients who are doing chelation with lots of tests to show what's coming out. The lawyer I talked to today said I should test after every single round. We haven't even tested once because Dr. Holmes hasn't told us to and I feel like I've already blown it because we didn't test in the beginning when it shows a lot of mercury coming out with DMSA only. We can barely afford to buy everything that goes along with chelation and certainly couldn't afford that much testing anyway. I faxed Dr. Holmes and told her to set us up on a schedule that would help our case and she said, "Be very careful on this endeavor. The real key to "proving" mercury toxicity where it will standup in court is showing enough abnormalities that only mercury can cause, not how much mercury is actually coming out, especially now that we are on to brain mercury. This does not ever come out in huge loads." I totally agree with her but the lawyers I've talked to say I won't have a chance without testing. I wanted to let everyone know so especially the parents who are just starting chelation, make sure you get plenty of testing done if you plan on pursuing a law suit.

Re: Lawsuit Frustration

Sounds to me like the lawyer needs some education on the issue and just how chelation works....not more testing. ann a gram ... that ... of tests ... should...
